

Aura Photography

What is aura photography?

An aura camera has biofeedback sensors that you place your hands on while the picture is being taken. The sensors gather information about your electromagnetic fields and then convert the frequencies to colors. These colors are then superimposed onto the Polaroid picture of you as it is taken, resulting in a beautiful picture of you with your aura!

The color and shape of your aura can change with your emotions, moods, and experiences, and it can also be viewed as a snapshot of your current spiritual well-being. You can also see spirit guides, loved ones who are guiding you and what is coming your way.

The right side indicates one's expressive, active or masculine side, the personality one projects outward (how other people see us). This part of the picture also represents the recent past. If there is no color, or a "hole", so to speak, this may indicate a loss of some sort, perhaps a wish to "let go", a recent move, or a profound personal transformation.

Aura Photography

The left side indicates one's feminine, receptive, or feeling side, the part of the personality that receives, feels, accepts, and imagines. The color in this position is also indicative of what one is creating for him/herself in the near future. If there is an abundance of color here, the person may be focusing most of their attention in the future. If there is a lack of color here, the person may be dwelling on past memories and events.

The center of the image above the person's head indicates what the person is experiencing in the present moment. If there is a band of color stretching like an arc over the top, this indicates what the person's hopes, goals, and aspirations are. For example, an indigo blue arc may indicate that the person's highest aspirations may be spiritual. A red arc would indicate more physical, monetary or business goals.

Auras that expand outward indicate high energy, expressiveness, extroversion, social activity, desire for connection, positive outlook, and a sense of adventure. An expanding aura can also indicate spiritual expansion.

Auras closer in show an affinity for inward focus, sensitivity, desire for solitude, meditation, peace, tranquility, or rest. This could mean a need to express or move out.

Aura Colors

Please note that these colors and definitions do not necessarily apply to children

Red: Physical activity, vitality, power, the need to begin things, drive, action, challenge, the love of sports, leadership, connection with the earth, competition, 'strength of will', courage, passion, practicality, desire for possession, sense of adventure, and survival instinct. Very young people, especially males, have bright red auras. They are very active and "on the go". Dark red "inferred" may mean over-working one's auric energy.

Orange: Creativity, confidence, ambition, originality, sociability, openness, intuition, independence, expression, lateral thought, ability to solve problems and work without supervision. Many talented sales people, entrepreneurs and people that deal with the public have orange auras.

Yellow: The color of the intellect. Joy, fun, variety and spontaneity can be very important to one showing yellow. Cheerfulness, a bright sense of humor, and optimism coupled with a warm smile are typical of yellow energy. People with yellow have the ability to brighten the lives of people around them.

Green: The central color of the spectrum. It is the balance of the active and passive, the yin and the yang. Green signifies harmony, balance, gr owth, teaching, and healing energy. Family matters and parenting may be particularly important to those showing green. Very often teachers, social workers, and those involved with helping others will often have green featured strongly in their aura.

Blue: The color of calmness and peace. Those of us with blue in our aura are capable of deep feelings and have the ability to communicate with others more than verbally. Issues of trust, loyalty, devotion and empathy abound. It indicates that now is the time to communicate with one's self and trust more.

Violet: The magical, mystical color. Violet shows searching, questioning, and the ability to look more deeply than most. Such people search for truth and do not take everything at face value. They love to look within and tend to be very psychic and unconventional. They march to the beat of a different drummer.

White: The most spiritually motivated color. White is actually not a color, but a combination of all colors, giving the ability to see the "big picture". Such people often see the world in much more than physical terms and money is not always the object of life. The desire to be one with all can bring great wisdom. Usually, not many adults will show white in their aura.

Remember

Every color has its unique qualities and purposes. Imagine a color wheel. Each color is a location on the wheel. No color is better than any other color. Each has its own inherent lessons, its positive and challenging traits.

Remember, there are no bad colors!
